

Making Her Night

Category: Poems

written by Deirdre Hennings | July 26, 2019

Bad news interrupts
a night on the town...

In Central Park twilight,

we drop our holiday mood
like a heavy sweater in the heat when that call sends us reeling
as leukemia sucks us
into its bell jar, rings
our ears, jangles
minds, reverberates
into bone.

We can't lower that volume but distraction is at hand—tickets to Porgy and Bess— though I forget it begins with a knife fight.

When Serena sings
"My man's gone now,"
fear of what I might inherit swoops like a chicken hawk, rips my mask with icy talons;

I weep, ragged and raw.

We're in the third row.
At least I make the actress' night;
she thinks she's done one heck of an acting job, beaming to me at her curtain call.